1 INTRODUCTION

The Executive Agency for Health and Consumers, acting on behalf of the European Commission (DG SANCO, Directorate Consumer Affairs), has commissioned a consumer market study on the functioning of the market for vehicle fuels from a consumer perspective to Civic Consulting, lead Contractor of the Consumer Market Studies Consortium (CMSC).

Part 3 of the study presents the results of the price collection exercise.

2 COLLECTION AND ANALYSIS OF PRICES

This section presents the detailed results from the price collection exercise, in which we collected fuel prices directly from petrol stations in all 27 Member States, Iceland and Norway.

2.1 METHODOLOGY

In the framework of the price collection exercise, we collected prices in each country for a sample of stations in the capital city, in a rural area and from stations at motorways.¹ We collected price data for each of the selected fuel types in defined time slots on three days of a specified week (on Monday, 26 November 2012, Wednesday, 28 November 2012, and Friday, 30 November, 2012). We also aimed at covering, in each region, at least two leading brands and independent retailers. This allowed us to get an understanding of the price dispersion between different regions and between stations located at motorways and other stations. We also obtained information on price dispersion in a given region, both at a given point in time and throughout a week, thereby reflecting a possible price cycle. Finally, the collected data will allow us to obtain price differentials between leading brands and independent retailers.

To carry out this methodological approach we first prepared databases of telephone numbers of petrol stations to be called during the price collection exercise for each of the 29 countries under study. Following the recruitment of mystery shoppers for each of the 27 Member States of the EU, as well as Iceland and Norway, these databases of telephone numbers of petrol stations were compiled, country-by-country, following a well-defined process that involved a number of steps:

1. Identification of the relevant term for 'petrol station' in the language of the country in question;
2. Identification of major brands, independent retailers and supermarkets selling vehicle fuel in each country;
3. Identification of the appropriate boundaries of the capital city, rural area, and the relevant motorways in each country;

¹ Prices for rural areas were collected in one regional market per country. We applied a definition used by the German competition authority, which defines a regional market as a circle with a radius of 25 km, to be extended where necessary to allow for a large enough sample. A rural area may include one or more small cities. In the case of very small countries (e.g. Malta), this definition covers a large portion of the country, in which case we consider the country to represent one region/market alone. In these cases it is therefore not meaningful to differentiate price levels between regions. In the case of larger countries with multiple possibilities, the regional area was chosen at random.

4. Identification of the most suitable tools to search for petrol stations (e.g. brand websites, price comparison websites, websites of independent retailers, yellow pages, Google maps, motorway websites in the case of motorways);
5. Compilation of petrol stations database.

In this manner, databases for petrol stations in all 29 countries were established.²

During the preparation of this approach, we conducted test calls to a sample of petrol stations in four countries and confirmed that prices could be obtained in this way, if only the price for one fuel type was requested during each call, thereby reflecting the experience of a consumer who wants to increase price transparency by calling before driving to the station to fill up the car. Because of the need to obtain three prices (over the course of the week) from each sampled station for each type of fuel covered to account for a possible price cycle, we therefore focused this exercise on the two most important fuel types, Unleaded Petrol/Euro-super 95 (RON 95) and Diesel fuel.

Following the collection of price data by phone for these two types of fuel, we broadened the scope of the price collection by using price comparison websites that offered price data for multiple types of fuel. With the comparison website-based price collection it was not our main focus to understand price dispersion between regions or different points in time for the same fuel, but rather the price differences between different types of fuel at a given point in time. For each type of fuel listed on the websites we collected price observations for the capital city on three days of the specified week.

Finally, for the economic analysis of vehicle fuel prices, we draw on multiannual data reported by the European Commission through the Market Observatory for Energy, which presents consumer prices and net prices (excluding duties and taxes) of petroleum products in the EU Member States each week. This data has been downloaded and processed as part of the preparation of the economic analysis (see Part 1 of the study).

As indicated above, the overall price collection exercise involved three independent price collection activities, resulting in three independent price datasets and analyses. The purpose of these is to obtain complementary findings, which would be unattainable with one type of price data alone. The price collection activities and their expected results are summarised below:

1. Collection of price data at the pump by telephone for petrol and diesel in defined time slots at three predefined days of a specified week, for the capital city, a rural area and stations at motorways. This has resulted in the development of price differentials between regions in a country, between three different days of a week, and between leading brands, non-leading brands and supermarkets.

² The number of petrol stations collected varies according to the market size in the country in question.

2. Collection of price data from PCWs that offer price data for multiple types of fuels listed for the capital city (in all countries in which relevant PCWs could be identified. This allows a snapshot of prices of different fuels to be obtained on three different days of the week.
3. Collection of multiannual weekly national price data reported by the European Commission for Euro-super 95 and diesel fuel through the Market Observatory for Energy (EU27). This data, which represents average national fuel prices in different Member States, will be combined with other relevant data in a regression analysis of factors that may explain divergences in prices between countries.

Table 1. Price observations collected from petrol stations by phone

Source: Civic Consulting. Note: Sample sizes between the days vary as some petrol stations did not answer on certain days, or refused to answer the questions of the mystery shopper for various reasons.

Sample	Day 1 sample (Monday)	Day 2 sample (Wednesday)	Day 3 sample (Friday)	All days
All observations	3877	3714	3723	11314

Motorway petrol	544	514	504	1562
Motorway diesel	502	485	486	1473

The price collection results are generally shown for the entire sample of 29 countries, which comprises the EU27 Member States, as well as Iceland and Norway; however, when comparing the average fuel prices at manned and unmanned petrol stations, only those countries where unmanned stations were identified and included in the database are listed in the results table.

The findings are presented in the following order:

- ▶ Price differentials between regions;
- ▶ Price differentials between retailer types;
- ▶ Price differentials between days of the week;
- ▶ Price differentials between manned and unmanned stations.

2.2 PRICE DIFFERENTIALS BETWEEN REGIONS

This sub-section focuses on fuel price differences between three regions within countries, specifically the capital city, a rural area(s) and motorways. Because mystery shoppers called for regular petrol 95 and regular diesel fuel prices at petrol stations in each pre-defined region type, the collected price data have allowed us to analyse price differences between those regions.

The price differentials presented in the following table are expressed as percentages of the average price for the capital city. This has been done by setting the average price across all stations in the capital city for regular petrol 95 (Table 69) and regular diesel fuel (Table 70) equal to 100. Then the average prices for the rural area(s) and motorways are expressed in relation to the relevant capital city average, for example, as 102.1, which indicates an average price 2.1% higher than the capital city price in a given country. Notably, these regional price averages are based on all price observations collected throughout the week, i.e. through the relevant telephone calls made on each of three days. The total number of observations which feeds into these calculations is 11,314, with 5,868 pertaining to regular petrol 95 and 5,446 linked to regular diesel fuel.

The first table below shows regular petrol 95 prices by region for the 29 countries surveyed. As discussed, the average price of regular petrol 95 in the capital city across all three days has been set to 100. Then the average prices in rural areas and along motorways have been indexed to that capital city average. This allows for the evaluation of regional price differences without the interference of different currencies or price level variations among countries.

With respect to regular petrol 95, the average price in rural areas was cheaper than the average capital city price in 17 of the 29 countries. This was most notably the case in France, where the average price for petrol in rural areas was 4% below the average price in Paris. Other countries in which the average rural price was relatively far below the average capital city price include Ireland (2.4%), Italy (2.4%) and Belgium (2.1%).

In two countries – Estonia and Luxembourg – the average price of regular petrol 95 at the rural petrol stations in the sample was equal to the average price at the capital city stations.

In the 10 remaining countries, the average rural price was higher than the average capital city price. The country which stands out in this regard is Austria, where the average rural price was 3.2% above the average price in Vienna. Greater than a 1% difference in average prices was also observed in Greece (1.5%), Spain (1.5%) and Lithuania (2.0%).

Overall for the 29 countries, the average price index for the rural areas relative to the capital cities is 99.8.

From the findings for the samples of stations located along motorways, it is clear that the average motorway price for rural petrol 95 was higher than the average capital city price in the vast majority of countries. Indeed, only in six countries was the average motorway price below that of the capital city, and in only three of these countries – France (98.4), Italy (98.5) and Romania (98.2) – was the difference more than 1%.

In several countries, namely Luxembourg, Portugal, Slovenia and Iceland, the average motorway price for regular petrol 95 was similar to that in the capital city.

In the 19 other countries, the average motorway price was higher than the average capital city price. In some cases, e.g. Austria (110.6), Hungary (105.3), the Netherlands (104.5), Belgium (103.7) and Greece (103.5), the average price difference was more than 3%.

The average index for stations located along motorways in the 29 countries is 101.3, suggesting that motorway prices are generally more expensive than those in capital cities and rural regions.

A further question is to what extent prices vary in a particular region over a certain time period. This price dispersion can be measured by the standard deviation, which measures the extent to which prices vary between each other. The standard deviation values (in Euro) are presented in the table below and represent the mean standard deviation over the three days of the price collection exercise.

As can be seen in the table above, the price dispersion for all samples and regions was identical and rather small (0.03 Euro) using the standard deviation. This seems to indicate that on average, different regions have very similar levels of price dispersion. However, there were some notable differences between countries. Austria (0.06 Euro), Italy, France, Portugal and the UK (all 0.05 Euro) all showed relatively high average rates of dispersion. However, other countries – such as Luxembourg, Slovenia, Iceland, Latvia, Lithuania, Sweden, and Cyprus had comparatively low rates.

The next table displays the indexed average prices by region for regular diesel fuel. As in the preceding table, the index sets the average price for regular diesel fuel across all sampled petrol stations in the capital city of each country to 100.

Consideration of the indexed average diesel prices by region makes clear that they follow the same general trend as prices for regular petrol 95. For regular diesel fuel, the average rural index for all 29 countries is 99.8 (identical to the result for regular petrol 95), and, for motorways, it is 101.7 – only slight more than the petrol result of 101.3.

In terms of differences between average rural prices for regular diesel fuel and those seen in the capital cities, France (95.1) and Ireland (97.7) again stand out as having the lowest average rural prices relative to those observed in their capital cities. In contrast, four countries – Finland (102.3), Greece (101.3), Norway (101.2) and Austria (101.0) – showed average rural prices 1% or more above those in their capital cities.

Only three in countries –Estonia (99.7), Slovakia (99.8) and Luxembourg (99.9) – were average motorway prices for regular diesel fuel lower than average capital city prices, and in all of these cases the difference was less than 0.3%.

Conversely, in Austria (107.4), Belgium (104.6), Germany (104.4) Hungary (104.1), Greece (103.7) and the Netherlands (103.5) the average motorway price was at least 3% higher than the average capital city price. Five of these six countries are the same ones for which this finding held in regard to regular petrol 95.

2.3 PRICE DIFFERENTIALS BETWEEN RETAILER TYPES

In each country, mystery shoppers also ascertained whether stations contacted were operated by major brands, non-major brands and independents, or by supermarkets/hyper-markets. They did so by performing desk research and verification through relevant online resources, as necessary. Based on this data, we have calculated average prices for major brands, non-major brands/independents, and supermarkets/hyper-markets in the different countries. Prices have been converted into percentages, whereby the petrol price index for the entire country is set to 100, and the average price index of each retailer type compared directly, as can be seen in the table below.

Table 5. Price differentials between retailer types for regular petrol 95, analysis by country

Source: Civic Consulting price collection from petrol stations. (N=5,868). Note: Prices for France are influenced by several stations located in central Paris that were substantially above the capital city average - in March 2013 results were verified through follow-up research.

For regular petrol 95, in most countries prices were lower in service stations owned by non-major brands and independents, and lower again in supermarkets and hyper-markets. Notably in France, non-major brand prices were substantially above (114.8) prices for other types of retailers. However, this appeared to be a significant outlier due to the high price charged by several stations in central Paris, and most were owned by non-major brands or were independent.

The countries with the lowest average prices for non-major brands and independents compared to major brands were Hungary (97.5), Austria (97.8), and the Czech Republic (98.5). In contrast, the average price of petrol 95 sold by non-major brands and independents was higher than that of major brands in Belgium (100.4), Cyprus (100.8), Estonia (100.3), Lithuania (100.5), and the UK (100.2).

Regarding supermarkets, results were more limited because the mystery shoppers were able to collect prices from supermarket or hypermarket fuel retailers from only 12 countries. However, in all of these countries with the exception of Ireland (101.7), prices were cheaper than the national average. These differences were most pronounced in Austria (92.9), Portugal (94.4), and Belgium (94.9).

As before, price differentials were also calculated for diesel fuel. The table below displays these by country:

Table 6. Price differentials between retailer types for regular diesel fuel, analysis by country

Consideration of the indexed average diesel prices by retailer makes clear that they follow the same general trend as prices for regular petrol 95. For regular diesel fuel, the average non-major/independent index for all countries except France is 99.6 (identical to the result for regular petrol 95), and, for supermarkets, it is 97.6 – only slightly more than the petrol result of 96.9.

In terms of differences between average independent/non-major retailer prices for regular diesel fuel and the country average, Austria (97.3), Hungary (98.4), and the Czech Republic (98.7) stand out as having the lowest average prices relative to those observed overall. In contrast, Belgium (102.4) and France (104.8) showed average independent prices 1% or more above the average for other retailer types.

Only in Ireland (101.4) were prices in supermarkets and hypermarkets more expensive than the country average. The lowest supermarket prices, on average, were seen – similarly to the petrol prices – in Austria (94.1), Belgium (94.1), and the Netherlands (95.3). It is also interesting to note that in Belgium (100.6) and Austria (100.9), the average prices for major brands were concurrently the highest in the countries surveyed.

2.4 PRICE DIFFERENTIALS BETWEEN DAYS OF THE WEEK

Because mystery shoppers called to collect prices for both fuel types on three days of the week, the collected data have also allowed for the development of price differentials between those days. For these differentials, the average price across all stations surveyed in a given country on Day 1 has been set to 100, and then the average prices for Day 2 and Day 3 have been related to that index.

The following table shows these results for regular petrol 95. The arrows in the final two columns indicate price increases or decreases relative to the previous day. This allows for visual insight into the types of price cycles witnessed in the countries.

The figures for Day 2 indicate a nearly equal mix of average price increases and decreases relative to Day 1. In 11 countries the average price for regular petrol 95 was lower on Day 2 (Wednesday) than Day 1 (Monday), but in 10 countries the average price for this fuel type increased from Day 1 to Day 2. In the remaining eight countries the average regular petrol 95 price was static.

This pattern changes substantially when one considers the changes in the average price between Day 2 and Day 3 (Friday): in 19 of the countries the average price for regular petrol 95 fell between Day 2 and Day 3, in 5 countries it increased, and in five it did not change.

Comparing the average Day 3 prices against those for Day 1, one sees that in 19 countries the average price was lower at the end of the week than at the beginning; in contrast, the average price was higher at the end of the week in six countries and the same in the remaining four. Generally, average price changed by less than 1% between Day 1 and Day 3. Exceptions include Denmark (98.6), France (98.8), Luxembourg (98.6) and Romania (98.6), where the average price fell by more than 1% between Day 1 and Day 3; and Spain (101.3), Malta (105.9), Slovenia (101.2) and Norway (101.8), where the average price increased by more than 1%.

Overall, there were seven countries in which the average price for regular petrol 95 decreased both from Day 1 to Day 2 and from Day 2 to Day 3: Bulgaria, Denmark, Germany, Estonia, France, Finland and Iceland. In contrast, there were two countries in which the average price increased to Day 2 and again to Day 3: Italy and Malta. In all other countries prices were consistent throughout the week (Greece, Cyprus, Portugal) or the price changes were mixed, e.g. a price increase was followed by a decrease.

The next table presents the price differentials by day of the week for regular diesel fuel. Again, the average Day 1 price serves as the index for each country, and the arrows in the last two columns indicate price increases or decreases relative to the prior day.

The average price for regular diesel fuel among the sampled stations decreased between Day 1 (Monday) and Day 2 (Wednesday) in 15 countries; it increased in another 10 countries; and in the remaining four, it stayed constant. Approximately the same mix of price movements describes the price changes from Day 2 to Day 3 (Friday): the average price of regular diesel decreased in 12 countries, increased in 11 and remained the same in six.

Considering the average price at the end of the week (Day 3) against that observed at the beginning of the week (Day 1), it is clear that the average price was lower in 14 countries at the end of the week than it had been at the beginning. The opposite was true in 12 countries, and no change in the average price was observed in three.

The Day 1 to Day 3 average price difference exceeded 1% in only six countries: Bulgaria (98.6), Germany (98.6), Spain (103.5), Luxembourg (98.7), Malta (97.1) and Norway (98.9)

Overall, the average price for regular diesel fuel decreased both from Day 1 to Day 2 and from Day 2 to Day 3 in six countries: Bulgaria, Germany, Greece, France, Poland and Finland. Conversely, it increased to Day 2 and again to Day 3 in Spain and Denmark. The average price of regular diesel fuel was consistent across all three days in only the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

2.5 PRICE DIFFERENTIALS BETWEEN MANNED AND UNMANNED STATIONS

In countries where they could be identified, mystery shoppers also contacted unmanned petrol stations to collect prices for both fuel types, i.e. regular petrol 95 and regular diesel fuel. They did so by calling the contact number of the retailer running the unmanned station or network of unmanned stations and following up by email, if necessary. Based on this data, we have calculated average prices for both manned and unmanned stations in the applicable countries. These average prices are based on data from all regions of each country and all three days of the week. The prices were collected in local currencies and are inclusive of different fuel levies. The average is based on the percentage difference observed in each country.

The following table presents the average prices at manned and unmanned stations for regular petrol 95. National currency values have been converted to Euro based on the specific exchange rate applicable on the day of the data collection procedure.

In 13 of the 14 countries for which price observations from unmanned stations were collected, the unmanned stations, on average, sold regular petrol 95 at slightly to significantly lower prices than the manned stations in the same country. This was most notably the case in Belgium and Austria, where prices at unmanned stations were, on average, 6.1% and 7.3% cheaper than at manned stations. Only in Greece was the average price at unmanned stations higher than that at manned stations, but this finding is based on a limited number of price observations at unmanned stations.

Overall, the average percentage difference in the price offered by unmanned and manned stations was -1.9%, indicating an average price at unmanned stations nearly 2% below that observed at manned stations.

The next table presents the average price findings for regular diesel fuel at manned and unmanned stations.

 NO	1.85	1.76	-5.1%

In those 13 countries where price observations were collected from unmanned stations, the average price at those stations was unanimously lower than the average price at manned stations. Again, this was most notably the case in Belgium (7.3% lower) and Austria (6.0% lower), though the average price at unmanned stations was also substantially lower in Norway (5.1%).

Overall, the average difference was -2.7% for regular diesel fuel, indicating that prices at unmanned stations tended to be almost 3% lower for this fuel type.

In sum, these findings indicate that both regular petrol 95 and regular diesel fuel were consistently less expensive at unmanned stations surveyed during this price collection exercise than at the manned stations.

2.6 PRICE DATA COLLECTED DURING PHONE CALLS TO STATIONS

The following pages present the price observations obtained by calling petrol stations. In case a price observation could not be obtained at a given station, a mystery shopper entered one of several codes into the appropriate table cell:

- ▶ F: Phone connection not established or a voice message was played;
- ▶ B: The line was busy;
- ▶ U: Phone unanswered after approximately 30 seconds of ringing;
- ▶ R: Station employee immediately refuses or is unable to provide a price.

In case their initial call resulted in a 'B' or a 'U', mystery shoppers subsequently returned to that phone number and tried again to reach a station employee.
